

US and Euro corporate bonds 2023 Outlook

A rising default rate need not be such bad news for IG credits

FLASH NOTE

SUMMARY

- 2022 has been an annus horribilis for corporate bonds, with no developed-market (DM) segment posting positive total returns year to date. High-yield (HY) bonds have fared better than investment-grade (IG) ones, as the former have been less penalised by rising rates, in part due to their higher coupons. Nevertheless, since the beginning of November total returns have improved all round, helped by falling government bond yields and tighter credit spreads.
- Ahead of recessions, US HY spreads have typically reached around 800 bp. Yet on 9 December, HY spreads over Treasuries of similar maturity were below 500 bps. Coupled with the surge in HY companies' borrowing costs this year, comparatively low spread levels have us worried that HY credit spreads may not offer sufficient protection against a surge in defaults.
- As such, we expect US and euro HY spreads to widen significantly later next year, to 680 and 800 bps, respectively. Nevertheless, until the expected recession damages companies' profitability, HY spreads are likely to remain range bound as some market participants are keen to lock in historically attractive yields, hoping that companies will be able to weather a mild recession. But until we have more clarity on the severity of the emerging cyclical downturn, we remain underweight HY bonds in general.
- Even if HY yields are juicier, short-term US and euro IG bonds offer attractive coupons for buy-and-hold investors without having to take on too much duration or credit risk. Moreover, IG bonds have historically fared better than HY in times of economic recession and rising default rates. These considerations should not be ignored in today's volatile fixed-income markets and explain our neutral stance on both US and euro IG corporate bonds.

Performances and returns may increase or decrease as a result of currency fluctuations. There can be no assurance that these projections, forecasts or expected returns will be achieved. ANNUS HORRIBILIS FOR CORPORATE BONDS

So far, 2022 has been an annus horribilis for corporate bonds, with no developed-market (DM) segment posting positive total returns. Year-to-date, high-yield (HY) bonds have outperformed their investment-grade (IG) counterparts, being less penalised by rising rates (in part due to higher coupons). The ICE Bank of America Merrill Lynch (ICE BofAML) Investment-Grade Corporate Bond Index is down -14.1% year to date (to 9 December), while its HY counterpart is down 'only' 10%. It is the same story for euro credits, with negative performances in the low double digits. Nevertheless, since the beginning of November total returns have improved all round, helped by falling government bond yields and tighter credit spreads.

As a result of this rally, euro HY credit spreads have declined to just above 500 bps over Bunds and their US counterparts' spread over US Treasuries are even tighter (at 446 bps on 9 December), helped in part by a higher exposure to the energy sector. Spreads have also tightened significantly in IG as the recent rise in yields has made short-term quality bonds seem a good alternative to cash.

TOO COMPLACENT ABOUT RECESSION RISKS?

Even though HY bonds offer juicy yields by historical standards (at 8.5% for US high yield and 7.2% for European HY on 9 December), we expect the tables to be reversed in 2023.

There have been increasing signs that the US and Europe will enter into a recession next year. The US Institute for Supply Management (ISM) survey for manufacturing activity dipped in contraction territory (i.e. below 50) in November, while US banks are imposing highly restrictive lending conditions on firms. These are usually two reliable harbingers of recession in the US. Since 2000, contraction in the ISM manufacturing index has been a prelude to a slowdown in US economic activity or a recession. In turn, recessions have often led to a rise in default rates, usually synonymous with poor performance for HY corporate bonds due to sharp spread

For illustrative purposes. Past performance should not be taken as a guide to or guarantee of future performance. widening (see chart 2). During a recession, US HY spreads levels have typically risen close to 800 bps, compared with around 500 bps today. This discrepancy, coupled with the recent surge in HY companies' borrowing costs, has us worried that credit markets are not offering sufficient protection against the risk of rising defaults.

Part of the apparent market complacency stems from the decline in new HY issuance, down 80% from this time last year. The lack of new issuance and distant maturity walls mean that interest expenses on corporate bonds have not risen significantly this year for most DM companies. Nevertheless, the rise of leveraged loans in recent years means that 50% of US HY and 40% of euro HY outstanding debt is at floating rates (see chart 3). The recent sharp rise in policy rates exposes companies with leveraged loans to higher funding costs just as profits growth is likely to slow.

We therefore expect US and euro HY spreads to widen significantly later next year to 680 and 800 bps, respectively. Nevertheless, until companies' profitability starts to suffer, spreads are likely to remain range bound as some market participants are keen to lock in historically attractive yields, hoping that companies will manage to weather a mild recession. But without more clarity on this count, we remain underweight on HY bonds in general, preferring quality credit, where the risk-reward ratio seems more balanced.

LOOK FOR 'SAFE' CARRY IN IG

Finally, even if yields are higher in the HY segment, short-to-medium-term IG bond yields are also elevated by historical standards in both the US and Europe. At 5.2% and 3.8%, respectively, they have moved up significantly since the beginning of the year (according to ICE BofAML 3-to-5-year maturity buckets indices on 9 December, see chart 4 and 5).

Moreover, IG bonds have historically fared better in times of economic recession and when default rates rise. First, their higher ratings usually mean the probability of default for IG bonds is low. Companies are normally first downgraded to the HY category. Second, their smaller coupon cushion makes IG bonds returns more sensitive to movements in government bond yields, which tend to fall in recessions due to expectations for policy rate cuts.

So, even if we expect the recession to drive both US and euro IG spreads wider by year-end 2023 (to 190 and 250 bps, respectively), we still foresee positive total returns for short-term IG bonds, which offer attractive coupons for buy-and-hold investors without having to take on too much duration or credit risk. These are considerations not to be ignored in today’s volatile fixed-income markets and uncertain economic environment. As such, we remain neutral US IG corporate bonds and have recently moved from underweight to neutral on their euro counterparts.
