FLASH NOTE

SUMMARY

- According to data from the World Gold Council, official demand for gold surged in 2022, mostly driven by unreported purchases.
- Countries looking to reduce their dependency on the US dollar may be behind such a large increase in unreported official demand.
- Looking forward, official demand may stay above levels seen before 2022. At the same time, opportunity costs may be a drag on investment demand.
- We recently revised higher our projections for the yellow metal. Our three-month projection now stands at USD1,820 per troy ounce (compared to USD1,853 on 13 February) and our 12-month projection at USD1,980.

MASSIVE OFFICIAL DEMAND SUPPORTED THE GOLD PRICE IN 2022

The recent publication of the breakdown of gold demand in 2022 by the World Gold Council (WGC) showed massive buying by the official sector, which scooped up 1,136 tonnes last year (150% more than in 2021). Most of these purchases were in the form of unreported purchases (estimated to have been 755 tonnes if one looks at the mismatch between supply and demand). As a reminder, the official sector represents mostly central banks as well as sovereign wealth funds. The latter are usually quite secretive about their asset allocation, while central banks may not always publicly report their purchases given gold's strategic role as an alternative to the US dollar. "Unreported purchases" refer to undeclared purchases by such entities.

In light of its sheer volume, much of the so-called unreported demand likely comes from central banks. In 2022, the Bank of Russia stopped reporting its gold purchases but said it would buy gold domestically. That said, the Bank of Russia alone cannot adequately explain the rise in official demand, since Russia produced slightly more than 300 tonnes of gold last year and domestic demand outside the central bank (for jewellery, gold bars and coins) came to 60 tonnes, according to WGC data.

Because of its past habit of not disclosing gold purchases and given its relatively low (reported) gold reserves as a percentage of the total, China is a likely suspect for most of the increase in unreported demand. As per its dual-circulation strategy, China aims to wean itself off dependency on the US dollar, which currently accounts for a large part of its foreign-exchange reserves.

Other countries besides Russia and China may also wish to reduce their dependency to the US dollar in light of the West's freezing of Russia's FX reserves. Overall, unreported purchases could lead to higher official demand in the next few years. Nevertheless, the outlook for gold price may not be as bright as in 2009 when central banks switched from being net sellers of gold to net buyers.

OPPORTUNITY COSTS COULD WEIGH ON INVESTMENT DEMAND

Besides the magnitude of the shift in official demand, investment demand may also switch to a new equilibrium, but a lower one. Indeed, the sharp increases in interest rates since last year mean that gold now faces tough comparisons with other safe-haven assets such as government bonds. It would not be surprising to see investment demand continue to hover in the next few years around the 2022 level, which was close to the lowest in 14 years.

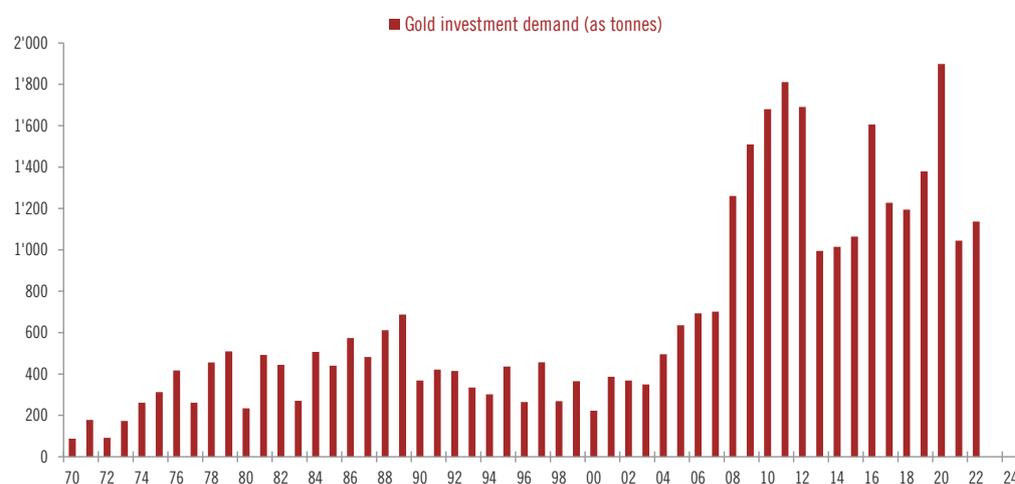

That said, there could be scope for some improvement in investment demand this year. Although unlikely in the next months, at some stage, the start of a monetary easing cycle in the US should lead to renewed interest in gold from investors. In the short term, concerns over the US federal debt ceiling may also offer some temporary support to the gold price by provoking higher global risk aversion, as happened during a similar episode in 2011.

Jewellery demand for gold may also be hurt by relatively high prices. Chinese demand could improve in the short term thanks to post-covid 'revenge spending' fuelled by high household savings—but could quickly evaporate, as was the case in India.

Performances and returns may increase or decrease as a result of currency fluctuations. There can be no assurance that these projections, forecasts or expected returns will be achieved. The projection is not based on simulated past performance.*

Overall, we do not see the same strong dynamics as in 2009, when all the major sources of gold demand pushed the gold price higher at the same time. That said, a structural increase in official demand would likely make the gold price more resilient to dips in investment flows of the kind seen in 2022.

GOLD TO REMAIN ATTRACTIVE AS A STRATEGIC ASSET

Overall, we see high geopolitical uncertainties as supporting the gold price due to higher official demand in the years ahead. We acknowledge that it is difficult to know where the recent increase in unreported gold purchases comes from. We also admit that the gap between known supply (i.e. from mining and recycling) and known demand (jewellery, investment, usage in technology and reported central bank demand), which is roughly equal to unreported official demand and over-the-counter (OTC) trading, is, by nature, difficult to identify. In any case, since unreported purchases for gold probably reflects a desire by certain countries to diversify their strategic reserves, such demand could remain strong in the years ahead. While sovereign wealth funds may have increased their allocations to gold, their general investment goal to create long-term returns for future generations suggests that interest in non-yielding gold may not be as strong as unreported purchases would imply (especially since the rise in yields means that bonds are once again being seen as a credible option for capital preservation).

In light of all these considerations, we recently revised higher our projections for the gold price. Our three-month forecast currently stands at USD1,820 per troy ounce (compared to a price of USD1,853 on 13 February), our six-month forecast at USD1,920 and our 12-month forecast at USD1,980.
